

IR211: America as a Global Power: FDR to Biden

Lecturer: Professor Peter Trubowitz

Class instructor: Mr. Thomas Wilkinson

Summer school programme area: International Relations, Government and Society

LSE teaching department: International Relations

Prerequisites: At least one introductory course in social science, history, or law.

Course Content:

This course examines the evolution of American statecraft since World War II, with special emphasis on the president's role in defining the nation's interests. Drawing on historical and contemporary cases, we consider how international power and domestic politics shape the president's geopolitical priorities and how those priorities have changed over time.

The course is designed to increase students' knowledge of why America's leaders pursue the grand strategies they do and what the American experience can tell us more generally about the international and domestic sources of grand strategy and statecraft.

Teaching format

There are 36 hours of lectures and 18 hours of classes. Students are expected to attend all lecture and class meetings and actively engage in class discussion.

Formative coursework

Students must prepare a short 1-2-page essay outline (to be submitted on Friday of week one) and one in-class presentation in consultation with the class teacher.

Course assessment

Assessment is based on one 1500-word written essay and one written examination. The essay will be based on a prompt provided by the course instructor and count for 50% of the final mark. It will be due on Thursday of week two, with results reported on Monday of week three. The two-hour exam will be held at the end of the programme (Friday of week three). The exam will count for 50% of the final mark, and the precise time and location of the exam will be circulated during the programme.
